This course is concerned with the key problems and puzzles of civil-military relations: What is the proper relationship between the politician and the soldier in a modern state? Why do those with guns obey those without them? How does professionalism affect the military’s political behavior? Should military organizational ethos reflect societal values, or should the military have its distinct norms even if they conflict with those of society? Why are some and not other societies prone to military intervention in politics? How do new democracies exert control over authoritarian militaries? What role do militaries play in social revolutions, such as the Arab Spring? We will examine these questions in different political contexts—from consolidated democratic regimes to transitional democracies and autocracies—across the world, including the U.S., Europe, Latin America, China/Asia, Africa and the Middle East.

This course will examine how foreign actors and trends have contributed to historical developments in Africa and the way in which Africans have driven historical change outside the continent. Topics of discussion include 1) Africa and Africans in the Indian Ocean and Atlantic worlds, paying special attention to the bonds of trade, religion, and enslavement from the fifteenth to nineteenth centuries 2) European exploration and intervention in Africa and Africans in Europe and the United States during the long nineteenth century 3) roles of African students, soldiers, and intellectuals abroad in the world wars, liberation struggles, and nationalist movements 4)Lebanese communities in West Africa and South Asian communities in East Africa and their roles in formal colonization and the transition to independence 5)Oil politics, humanitarian involvement, and international migration as a way of thinking about resource extraction, justifications for foreign intervention, and labor trends in historical perspective.

3003 National Security Policy

This course will look at how the national security policymaking process developed from the National Security Act of 1947 through the Goldwater-Nichols DOD Reorganization Act of 1986 to the present. This will entail a thorough examination of the US interagency process both in theory and how it works in practice. In terms of substance, we will consider the products beginning with NSC 68 and continuing up to the current National Security Strategy of the United States. We will also examine a series of case studies beginning with the 1989 invasion of Panama up to and including the current conflict in Iraq. As a counterpoint to the major cases we will consider the variety of "low intensity" national security conflicts that have involved the US since the end of World War II.

3003 Poverty & Inequality in the Middle East
3003 Practice of Diplomacy
3003 Race & Immigration in Europe

This course will explore the way that questions of race have shaped European society and politics, as well as the ways that immigration has created the uneasily multi-cultural Europe that we know today. We will explore topics such as the origins of immigration policy in interwar Europe, anti-Semitism and the Holocaust, immigration and imperialism, post-colonial immigration from Africa and Asia, the place of Islam in European society, and the emergence of anti-immigration political movements on the extreme right. This course will cover the period from 1914-2014 and will give students a historical as well as a contemporary perspective on questions of race and immigration in European society. In addition to our readings of leading scholars in this field, we will engage with historical documents, literature, and film, as well as with more contemporary news coverage.

4013 Capstone in International and Area Studies

Sec. 001 Global Environment/Disease Crisis, Dr. Miriam Gross
There are few larger threats to our global future than environmental and health crises. This class examines a series of global environmental and disease threats from the perspectives of international security, economic stability, global inequality, and social and familial well-being. Likely topics include: climate change, water scarcity, food security, pollution, AIDS, SARS, state-sponsored medical care, rural health care, chronic (lifestyle) diseases, over-population, and aging.

Sec. 003 Nations & Nationalism, Dr. Afshin Marashi

Nations, nationalism, nation-states, nation-building, and ethno-national conflict are all phenomena that are increasingly at the center of contemporary international affairs. This capstone course will investigate the nature of these interrelated, yet distinct, concepts from an interdisciplinary perspective. Students will do close readings from the fields of history, sociology, anthropology, political science, and related fields in order to gain a broad understanding of the scholarly literature in the field of “comparative nationalism studies.” Students will also complete an individual research project on a specific case-study of nations and nationalism. The goal of the course is to introduce students to the social science literature in the field of nationalism studies, while also looking for ways of applying these theoretical insights to practical real-world contexts.

Sec. 004 China’s Global Quest for Resources, Dr. Bo Kong

This course conducts a systematic survey on how a rising China engages the international system to pursue and protect its raw material interests around the globe. It is organized around for overarching questions: 1) What shapes the country’s foreign resource policy, who formulates it, and how? 2) How do the government of China, its financial institutions, and its corporations – both state-owned and private – interact with each other in their pursuit and protection of the country’s foreign resource interests? 3) How do these different players confront the various challenges for the country’s raw material interests overseas? And, 4) What does the way China pursues and protects its raw material interests abroad tell us about the country’s role and impact in the international system? To help students navigate the above complex, cross-cutting topics, this course will base each discussion on empirically tested analytical frameworks drawn from international relations theory, comparative politics, and the business management literature.
